

Mark Esserman

First off, I want to say that the LSAT is not a simple test to grasp. I have always had considerable concentration issues, and even though academic class material comes easy, standardized tests always present a significant challenge. However, for law school, relying on GPA single-handedly is not enough. Admissions committees care immensely about the LSAT. Jonathan and I worked together for almost six months. I always looked forward to our Friday afternoon sessions, as they were not only enjoyable, but informative. He coached me in the basic principles necessary to comprehend the fundamentals of LSAT questions. With these internalized, the test comes much easier. With Jonathan's assistance, I ended up bringing my score 13 points higher than my initial diagnostic test. This makes a world of difference in the LSAT, no matter where your score is prior to instruction.

I also think it is imperative to note that I was going through a very trying time during our preparations. I was balancing work, intensive classes at Columbia, wedding planning, and adjusting to New York City. I could have spent much more time studying at home and/or meeting Jonathan for sessions. The reason I bring this up is because it says a lot about his aptitude that my score was brought up so high, even though I may have neglected doing my part as a client. I can only envision what would have happened if I studied at home for a couple of hours a day, or met him two to three times a week. That being said, I ask you, a potential client, to reflect on what you are willing to put into your LSAT preparations. With Jonathan's services and your own commitment, I have no doubt that one could bring their score up tremendously, opening up the doors to law school opportunities all over the country. Aside from our discussions in arguments, logic games, and reading comprehension, Jonathan took time to instruct me in law school application strategies, personal statement recommendations, and law school suggestions. We made meaningful progress in every area regarding this momentous period in my life. I have no doubt he can do even more with a client who has the intrinsic motivation to make a high LSAT score one of their primary motivations.

This Fall, I will have many options for law schools that I never would have imagined. I owe so much of it to Jonathan. If you are serious about law school, then consider this the first investment towards your future. It's all reward, and no risk.