In preparing for the LSAT, I initially signed up for a weekly course. I quickly realized it would be far too long before we tackled the more complex logic games, which were causing me the most trouble according to my diagnostic exam (on which I scored a 154). Looking to supplement my course with a private tutor, I found Jonathan and realized his ability to teach the material clearly and concisely was far superior to that of my course instructor. Jonathan has a knack for breaking down logic games into a process that can always be implemented, regardless of the game's complexity.

Once I had made it through the logic games, Jonathan took over my tutoring in logical reasoning and reading comprehension, as well. Though slightly unconventional, I began looking at my class as extra practice to bolster what I learned in my sessions with Jonathan. He was able to look through my course materials and cater his lessons to teach me more nuanced and complex versions of what I was learning in class. By supplementing the fundamentals with his examples of harder and rarer questions, Jonathan made sure I was ready for anything the test would throw my way.

However, although everything that I have mentioned is true and irrefutably played an essential role in my success on this exam, it was actually Jonathan's natural calming demeanor and quirky test-taking tactics that got me through test day. Suggesting I take practice tests in loud spaces or under short time constraints, his methods allowed me to feel completely at ease when the actual exam arrived. He calmed me down when I got a bad score just weeks before the exam, ensuring me that it was a fluke. He kept me from fixating over my practice scores, instead emphasizing the importance of looking through both my wrong and correct answers to understand how and why I arrived at them. Essentially, Jonathan is a fantastic, fun, and one-of-a-kind tutor, without whom I would have likely gotten a much different score on this exam.
