Took LSAT: December 2012

I have decided to go back to school after graduating over 10 years ago. Not knowing where to start my LSAT studies, I figure it was best to go with Kaplan, a highly commercialized prep course company. I wanted personalized attention and was willing to pay the high cost because I wanted someone who can customize the teaching to my needs. I had a hard time finding a personal tutor that would fit me and give me the accountability that I was seeking.

I was referred to PreProBono by my alma mater's Pre-law advisor. That is when I was introduced to Jonathan Wang who would become my weekly LSAT tutor for the next 12 months. I quickly saw a difference between the Kaplan private tutor and Jonathan. Rather than forcing a "cookie cutter" lesson plan on me, Jonathan took the time to assess me. He set future goals and a study strategy based on my needs. I was impressed by his teaching style. Basically, he was patient yet aggressive. He was quick to point out my weaknesses, while positively encouraging me and reminding me that I could do better and achieve. He took the time to know and analyze how I mentally break things down and the traps that I fall into. That was the accountability that I needed.

I like the way Jonathan communicated with me. He was timely and always responded to my emails, texts and calls. There were times when I sent emails asking about questions that I do not understand. He not only made a point to address the question either by emails or in our tutoring sessions, but to explain in various ways until I understood how the answer came about.

I enjoyed my sessions with Jonathan. He is very personable and made me feel comfortable and uninhibited to ask questions or make mistakes. I am glad to have met him. He is a great, intelligent and reliable tutor. I would highly recommend him to anyone who is looking for an LSAT tutor.
