

Ellen Choe
LSAT: 170
NYU School of Law

When I first took the LSAT using TestMasters, I scored a 165 - 5 points below my target score. The second time around, I decided it was worth getting a tutor. Jonathan Wang was highly recommended by a friend and from our first session, I could tell why. Jon is incredibly patient, encouraging, personable, and most of all, an expert on all things LSAT. The way he explained questions, strategies and question types clicked with me in a way that the TestMasters curriculum never did. He was also very familiar with the TestMaster strategies and was able to get me to undo the inefficient habits I had picked up and learn and perfect a whole new strategy. Jon has a way of breaking logical concepts down to their fundamentals and making them easier to understand. If I didn't understand something, he would find new and different ways to explain it until I did understand, instead of trying to drill just one strategy into my head. Every session was personally tailored and I felt he was truly invested in my success. There were countless sessions in which we ran out of time but Jon stayed online to answer my incessant questions and calm any anxiety about the test. Additionally, I was working unpredictable and long hours while studying, and Jon was super flexible and always willing to work around my schedule.

Undoubtedly due to Jon's help and expertise, I scored a 170 and I'm headed to my first choice law school. When people ask me for LSAT advice, my first piece of advice is to contact Jonathan Wang. Before meeting with Jon, I had one introductory session with a different tutor and the experiences could not be more different. I truly believe Jon is a one-of-a-kind tutor who not only has the knowledge to make the most difficult LSAT questions and concepts seem easy but also the personality to put you at ease and make a stressful process a little more relaxing.